No results found Rewiring neurocircuitry as an approach to the treatment of OCD. Patients with obsessive-compulsive disorder (OCD) often receive psychopharmacologic treatments because of an intractable distressing, persistent or pervasive set of obsessions and compulsions. These are extremely powerful recurrent thoughts and urges which are autonomous of any distress or activity context. Given the evidence that repetitive responses to these obsessions and compulsions are mediated by mesocorticolimbic dopaminergic activation, an alternative approach for management is to enhance inhibitory processes in mesocorticolimbic circuits in order to interrupt OCD cycles of repetition. Rodent studies implicate a limbic-motor interface between the mediodorsal nucleus of the thalamus and cingulate motor cortex, and further support the idea of a cortico-limbic-striatal circuitry in OCD pathophysiology. Animal models of OCD have identified behavioral effects following thalamic and striatal lesions and in working memory experiments implicate the prefrontal cortex. This chapter presents a plan for this approach to management of OCD in a resource-limited environment. Conventional OCD medications and behavior therapy are often ineffective. Brain stimulation, including cortical electrodes, deep brain stimulation and the more recently developed optogenetics, are powerful in their capabilities of localizing brain tissue, mapping networks and determining if disruption of neural activity produces therapeutic benefits. The chapter summarizes emerging findings in neurocircuitry in which thalamic and striatal lesions, and functional neuroimaging using positron emission tomography and single photon emission tomography reveal changes in limbic motor cortex coupling, and the ability to document changes in OCD behavior as a consequence of interruption of mesocorticolimbic circuits. These animal data, together with clinical observations, will shape a therapeutic model for managing OCD.If you would like to see more articles like this please support our coverage of the space program by becoming a Spaceflight Now Member. A lightning strike destroyed a solar array on top of a Lockheed Martin-built Orion capsule last November, ruining a satellite communications relay that helps astronauts control Orion as it travels through space. Called the Advanced Communications Terminal, the piece of equipment was installed in the middle of the "service module" of Orion, the capsule set to carry astronauts to and from the International Space Station on a new version of NASA's deep-

A 15-year-old girl was admitted to our hospital because of thrombocytopenia and purpuric skin eruption. She was also diagnosed as having a thrombocytopenia with active vasculitis induced by the presence of immune complexes. This case was thought to be thrombotic thrombocytopenic purpura (TTP) because the patient had an abnormal platelet destruction in the presence of a monoclonal gammopathy and was serum an inhibitor to platelet glycoprotein (GP) IIb-IIIa. The symptoms and progress was favorable with steroid therapy, but active immunological abnormalities were persistent.

Therefore, we tried to confirm the thrombocytopenia by other means. The plasma level of the antibody which recognizes glycolalycin (Gc) was significantly elevated, and the antibody was considered to be produced by the patient herself. The antibody recognized the epitope of Gc, which is a component 6d1f23a050
