Subsequent innovations in wad design became increasingly complicated, using a shell plating pattern and firing forces to form a gas seal in the base of the wad. But the forward center of gravity remained the primary structural element. This caused the wad to distort under even low pressures and deform over time. This is an issue when replacing lead or composite wads with steel ones for improved resistance to heat and corrosion. Steel wads have a radius of curvature that is different from that of the cases. This causes the wad to bend and not seal correctly. As a consequence of the tradeoff between wad weight and gas seal quality, modern shell wads are generally more complex, lighter, and easier to manufacture than the simple over-powder wad. Wads come in a variety of shapes and sizes. Some cases are designed to accept a different type of wad. The main types used for specialty rounds are illustrated in this section.
